Creating a Hybrid Culture

5 Things People Need Now

Hybrid work is a seismic shift in how work happens for many organizations.

A New Era of Hybrid Work

A blend of on and offline interactions means we have to think about the needs of people as they adopt a new way of working, and how the workplace and technology need to change to help hybrid work be successful, regardless of how your company defines its policies.

The flexibility of hybrid work — and the trust it requires — can be a catalyst for new ways of working and redefine how the office can help people thrive. It may be challenging initially, but there's never been a greater opportunity for organizations to reset their culture.

Everyone, everywhere struggled with a feeling of isolation while working from home. Organizations that have returned to the office found people need to be reenergized and rebuild social connections to feel a strong sense of community at work and achieve more — leading to a culture based on shared purpose.

The workplace can be intentionally designed to foster community by creating spaces that help people feel a sense of belonging and connected to the organization. Research shows that feeling part of a strong community actually boosts productivity, engagement, innovation and retention. And it's critical to make changes before people come back to the office so they can see and feel their organization is taking action to meet their needs in a new era of hybrid work.

There's never been a greater opportunity for organizations to reset their culture.

5 Things People Need for Hybrid Work

1 Safety

Physical safety continues to be paramount. People need to know their organization is doing everything possible to keep them safe and mitigate the spread of disease. Sixty-two percent of respondents to a recent McKinsey study said that improved air filtration could decrease the stress they experienced from returning on site.

2 Belonging

In a time where people are working from diverse locations, people need their workplace to help create community and “social glue” that builds cooperation and team cohesion. Strong communities have a sense of shared purpose, as well as shared leadership. With high levels of trust and engagement, communities allow people to learn, adapt and demonstrate resilience in the face of changing circumstances.

3 Productivity

Hybrid work will require new spaces and technology to help people be effective. People need places for 1-on-1 or small group video calls, either enclosed or with greater acoustic privacy at their desk. Groups need places that support both in-office and remote participants equally – where everyone can see and be seen, hear and be heard. Spaces should be designed for a better virtual presence with important elements like cameras, acoustics, content and lighting.

4 Comfort

Physical comfort is critical for hybrid workers, especially if they are spending a lot of time on video. People’s wellbeing has suffered, and they need places and experiences that help them rejuvenate and reset throughout the day. People also need to be comfortable with how work is changing, and how to use new kinds of spaces and new technologies to collaborate with hybrid teams.

5 Control

While living through a crisis and changing ways of working, people crave more certainty. They want to be able to have more choice and control over:

- Where they work within the office
- When they work at the office or home
- How they work, alone and with teammates

Better Is Possible™

Although it will look different for everyone, hybrid work is, perhaps, the biggest opportunity organizations have to reinvent their culture. We will need to adjust our expectations about how work happens, adopt new behaviors and rethink the role of the office going forward.

Designing the hybrid workplace as a community can lead to new possibilities for people and organizations alike.

Essential solutions and new products create inspiring hybrid spaces for individuals and teams anywhere work happens.
